In very strong vines two or more bows may be left. Fig. 101 represents multiplied bow training, which is, perhaps, more ornamental than useful. the buds may all get an even start in the spring, the arms are sometimes bent down to the ground till the young shoots are a few inches long. When fastened to the trellis at once, the sudden bend near the base of the cane so checks the sap that the buds at that point are unduly developed, while the strong tendency of the sap to the extremity makes the buds there grow more rapidly Fig. 99. than those on the middle of the cane. See figures 98 and 99. When the two...
