He was consequently often called upon to average accounts, as most of the customers preferred paying several small purchases at one time or settling their running accounts by giving their notes. Having six or eight hundred accounts upon the Ledger, each of which at short periods required to be averaged, he found that it took up a large portion of his time in working equations and the idea occurred to him that possibly some shorter method of averaging accounts than the (me usually practiced, might be discovered, or that a set of Tables could be constructed which would greatly facilitate the process. After trying various experiments, with...
